Is the software...
Installed on premise? Data "in the cloud" is really just data sitting on someone else's computer. No matter how secure they claim their servers are, nothing beats the security of having your data on site.
Native on macOS and Windows? You need a system that works seamlessly with the programs and systems your employees know so you can avoid company-wide slowdown and system bottlenecks.
Within your price range? You don't necessarily need the most expensive software on the market. Buying the software that's "right-sized" for your business and built to grow with you is the most important consideration.
As customizable as you need? You need a system that works the way you do. Avoid systems that force you to shoehorn your business into their system. Ask each provider if they can customize the specific features you need most.
Up and running in a reasonable timeframe? ERP implementations take time. There's really no way around that. Remember to be skeptical if anyone gives you a time estimate that sounds too good to be true.
Easy to learn? ERP software is a different beast. To shorten the learning curve, look for companies that provide excellent training including: live demos, a dedicated trainer, and priority customer support for new users.
User-friendly? Is the system workflow and interface intuitive enough for everyone on staff to quickly understand how to get their job done?
